

INDIVIDUAL COACHING - Acquisition and development of behavioural skills

DESCRIPTION:

Coaching is for managers who want to acquire new managerial skills in the areas of Emotion & Stress Management, Productivity, Confidence, Decision making, Conflict Resolution, Purpose & Values, Change, Balance ...

Coaching is a structured process where the Coach and the Client focus more on solutions than problems. It is not about giving advice but rather encouraging the Client to draw from inner resources and experience. Coaching is stretching and challenging. The Coach will engage in direct discussions in the form of questioning.

PREREQUISITES:

It is essential that the Client has the firm intention to self-improve. While the Coach is the guarantor and responsible for the process, the Client will be responsible for the result of the process, depending on his/her involvement and willingness to progress towards the objectives defined beforehand.

MEANS:

The Coaching sessions as well as the possible group workshops take place at the Client offices or in a location agreed on by both parties. Virtual sessions can also be organized if needed. Printed &/or digital supports are handed out.

A STRUCTURED PROCESS:

THE COACHING OBJECTIVES:

At the end of the coaching, an evaluation is made of the achievement of the objectives set in the tripartite meeting with the manager and/or the HRD. During this meeting, the action plan that the Client may have to continue to carry out and on the complementary contribution of the hierarchical superior may be agreed upon. Each coaching meeting is the subject of a 'session contract' that serves as a guideline for the session and is elaborated from the material brought by the Client. Work can be given by the coach between sessions. At the end of the coaching, the Client is offered an interview after 6 months to analyse how the changes have taken hold, the difficulties encountered and the points of vigilance to be taken into account.
